things that they were eating. When they first showed up, use-by dates only showed freshness because producers wanted their products to be tasted in their best conditions.

However, most customers mistakenly believed that use-by dates showed how safe the food was, and they still largely do. But the truth is that these dates aren't related to the danger of food poisoning (中毒), according to Time News. Eggs, for example, can still be eaten three to five weeks after being bought, even though the use-by date is much earlier. When their use-by dates pass, strawberry-flavored cookies may lose their crunch (松脆的口感), but they are not harmful.

"It's an unclear subject, the difference between food quality and food safety," said Jena Roberts, vice president of National Food Lab, a US food testing company. "Even in the food industry has workmates who are not sure about it."

This is why scientists are calling for a standard explanation to be printed following the use-by dates. "We want this to be clearly communicated so customers are not misinterpreting the information and wasting a lot of food," said Dana Gunders, a staff scientist with the NRDC.

But this won't be a mistake that is easy to correct since people have believed it for so long. Another problem is that the quality levels of different foods change differently- some are still eatable long after their use-by date while others are not.

As a result, food factory officials are now thinking of changing the use-by date to a date showing when food is most likely to be thrown away.

My mom isn't fancy like other moms. They wear fancy clothes and drive fancy cars. My mom wears her gardening clothes when she walks me to school.

When fancy moms laugh, their laughs sound soft and whisper. You can hear my mom's laugh from down the hall. I show her how to laugh quietly and she practices. But before long she starts laughing even harder than before.

At the talent show, my mom cheers loudly, "Bravo, everyone! Bravo!" instead of clapping politely the way fancy moms do.

For our class hike, parents are invited. At breakfast I go over my rules for Mom, "Please don't whistle. Don't laugh loudly. No clapping. And stay in line."

The other moms show up wearing fancy jackets and sneakers. My mom wears cutoffs, a floppy straw hat, and her old hiking boots.

We hike along, all in a line. Soon Mom starts to whistle her hiking songs, She'll Be Coming Round the Mountain, I shake my head at her. She stops and whispers, "Oops. Sorry, Jane."

We keep hiking. Everything is perfect until...

Our teacher, Ms. Steele, stops and points, "A snake!" All the moms hold their kids' hands and back up, except my mom. "Watch out! It might be poisonous!"

I shut my eyes. I know what's coming next. Mom makes a sudden attack. "Got it!" she says. The other moms scream, not sounding fancy at all.

Kids gather around as Mom examines the snake. "It's OK to touch," she says. Everyone's too scared, but I go first. "Snakes aren't slimy," I tell them. Right away, others line up. A couple of the fancy moms come up to touch the snake's tail.

Later, Ms. Steele tells us to draw our favorite part of the hike. After a while, I look around quickly. Everyone's picture is of Mom and me with the snake.

As we hike back to the bus, I squeeze Mom's hand. "I'm glad I didn't tell you my don't-catch-snakes rule." She smiles. But soon, she's whistling her hiking songs again!

I start to make her silent, then stop. Instead, I take a deep breath and sing out too. Everyone joins in, even the fancy moms.

Do you know Bai Yansong? He was a famous TV host, expressing his support for students wearing green scarves at a primary school in Xi'an. He wore a green tie on a TV program.

"I just want the students to know that I'm also wearing green. And we are all great people and are as good as those wearing red scarves," he said.

The First Experimental Primary School in Xi'an made children with poor schoolwork and behaviors wear green scarves. Parents whose children wore green scarves were angry. "The punishment is too bad. All the children need their self-esteem (自尊) even though they are very young, and they know the green scarf means something is not quite right. It does harm to students' self-esteem," said one mother.

Educational expert Li Zhenxi said that primary and junior high school students have strong self-esteem. They hope to be respected (尊重) and understood. Punishment will hurt them. "It's better to encourage them rather than call them 'bad' students," he said. Now, the school has stopped the practice.

Some schools think more of students' self-esteem and have done better in protecting students' privacy (隐私) and encouraging them. In American schools, teachers post test results on the wall. Instead of using students' names, they use secret numbers. This way, students know their secret numbers and can check their own grades only. Many teachers in China tell students their grades by sending text messages to their students.

School and teachers are doing more for students' self-esteem. But it is a long way. Both teachers and parents should realize that tests scores are not the only measure(标准) of a student's ability. Everyone has his own strengths and everyone can make great progress by working hard. Adults should make students get to know their own value. The most important is to make students believe in themselves.
