Students at Empire High School started class with no textbooks — but it wasn't because they were short of money.

Instead, the school gave iBooks — laptop computers — to its 340 students, becoming one of the first U.S. public schools to stop using printed textbooks. School officials believe the electronic materials will make more students enjoy learning. Empire High School is designed to have a textbook-free environment.

Students at Empire High School get the materials over the school's internet network. The school has a central control system that limits what can be downloaded at the school. "Students can hand in homework online. We have an online program that helps to check if you have copied from others," Baker, the headmaster, said. In addition to offering up-to-date information, teachers can make their lessons more enjoyable. For example, history lessons can include links to a person's daily life, his ideas, his discovery, and so on.

Social studies teacher Jeremy Gypton said the change was easier than expected. Gypton said he assigned reading based on online materials, and used online groups and message boards to keep the students connected. And he also asked them to comment on each other's work.

Julian Tarazon, a new student, said it was hard at first, but after a couple of days, "you got used to it." Morgan Northcutt, another student, said the computer system had made it easier for them to do homework.

The school isn't completely paperless, however. It has a library and students can read books in it. "We're not trying to get rid of books," Baker said. "We love books."
