Earlier this week I went to an eye doctor. Since several diagnoses (诊断) showed that I was about to go blind, I had to go for a second check. I have just turned 30. In the waiting room a man began to talk with me. I'm a very private person and I actually didn't want to have a conversation with a stranger, but ended up telling him why I was there. This complete stranger expressed more sympathy (同情) than nearly every person that I am close to. After a minute, he got up and walked over to hand me something. I thought it would be a card with good wishes or his business card, so I reached out. However, it was money and it was not just a small amount. I was very surprised and tried to refuse his kind offer, but he replied, "If you get some good news today, you can go and celebrate with a nice dinner. If it's bad news, you can also get yourself a drink." At that moment I didn't know what to say and I don't think I did a very good job of accepting his generosity (慷慨).

Now, I'm still waiting to hear back from the doctor, but the signs are not good. I would probably need that drink, but the kindness of a stranger has helped me get through it.

The other day I was shopping at a local store and met a lady from India sitting on the floor, looking for a certain product on the bottom shelf (架子). She stood up immediately when she saw me in order to get out of my way. She said sorry and explained that she was a cashier (收银员) at a nearby store and was on her lunch break. She tried to get a few things before her time was up.

I said to her, "I am in no hurry. Go ahead and do what you need to do." She said that sometimes customers were rude to her at the store and she was really thankful for my kindness. I explained to her that I was a nurse and totally understood some of what she said. Sometimes, patients, families, or doctors could be very rude. But I tried to understand why they were feeling that way and let it go.

She thanked me for being so nice and friendly. I told her, "The world will be a better place if we all act kindly and politely toward each other. Those who are rude may have bad karma coming to them for treating people badly." She nodded and was surprised that I knew what karma was.

I was glad that I could help someone feel better for even a few minutes. What I did showed her that there are good and kind people in the world. Maybe she would think about that later in the day and would get comfort (安慰) when someone was treating her in an unkind way.
