B

My mother was born in China, but now we live in America. Because of her Chinglish, few would like to talk with her. People did not take her seriously, but pretended not to understand her.

My mother knows how poor her English is. So when I was fifteen, she began to have me call others on the phone to pretend I was her. Once I had to call her stockbroker (股票經紀人). Feeling uneasy, I said in a low voice, "This is Mrs. Liu." At that time, my mother was standing beside me, whispering (悄声说), "Why doesn't he send me the check? It's already two weeks late."

Then I said to him, "I'm getting rather worried. You agreed to send the check to me two weeks ago, but it hasn't arrived."

My mother added, "What does he want? I'll come to visit his boss and tell him all about this." So I turned to the stockbroker again, "I can't accept any more excuses. If I don't get the check today, I will talk to your boss next week."

The next week, she went to the company, and told all this to the boss—in her broken English. Luckily, the boss was friendly and the problem was solved soon.

When I was a teenager, her broken English made me feel uncomfortable sometimes. But now, I see it differently. To me, my mother's English is clear, pretty natural. It is my mother's tongue. It was the language that helped me form the way I saw things, and understood the world.

C. My Mother's English              D. English Is Important

C

That summer, I found a part-time job in KFC. It certainly wasn't a good one, but it meant money—that was something I really needed. At that time, every cent counted for me.

One day, I was working behind the front counter(前台) when a woman came in. She ordered her meal and I told her the price. As she was about to pay, the woman suddenly stopped and said weakly, "I'm sorry, but I guess I won't be able to pay the bill because I am about a dollar short." Maybe it was her voice that touched me. I was thinking of paying the dollar for her—it wasn't an easy thing for me, you know. I was always a mean person. She refused at first, but she finally agreed. Then she took away the food thankfully. I went on with my work. The customers were coming and going.

About an hour later, business slowed down and I was waiting for my next customer. Just then, I noticed the same woman walking towards me, with money in her hand.

She said smilingly, "I want to thank you for what you did. You see, I'm a diabetic (糖尿病患者), and sometimes I need to eat something right away. If you hadn't helped me, I might have fainted (昏厥)." Then she offered to hand me two dollars, twice what I'd given her and went away.

Holding the two dollars, I realized that what I'd received was not just some money, but also the happiness of knowing a poor student could also do something right.

Later, I often met the woman there. Every time, she would smile to me, and I smiled back.
